ARCHBISHOP PASCAL WINTZER OF POITIERS

La Croix International, 10 September 2018

As soon as they identify a crack, people often quickly want to ease it further open using a coin. That is the feeling that comes to me when I observe the anger unleashed against Pope Francis, anger emanating even from persons trained in discretion and moderation such as Archbishop Carlo Maria Viganò.

Certainly, those who are opposing Pope Francis have thought about their actions. But it is also clear that they have concluded that all that counts today is the theatre of the media. This is the field on which they have chosen to fight, making use of formulae and condemnations whose objective is not really to convince but to hurt.

I can understand that lay people, priests and bishops may have difficulty with Pope Francis' pastoral options, his manner and his decisions. As society experiences difficulties with identity issues and the relationship of time and space, so too does the Catholic Church – like most religious and philosophical systems. The church always attempts to deal with these challenges but – like others – always seems to be behind the times, which continue to move forward without stopping.

A contrario, some people prefer to return to a 19th century model that became extinct as a way of life in 1950. Since the beginning of his pontificate, Pope Francis has pointed to the knots that have entrapped the life of the Church, including the role of women and their effective responsibility, synodality, the influence of money and a thirst for power. The time has perhaps come to challenge centralism – both personal and geographic – and call for genuine local responsibilities. This may imply a need for continental or regional churches. In particular, it may involve effective responsibility of Christians in their community.

The ordained ministry of an episcopal and apostolic kind would thus become less a matter of government and more a role of exhortation, formation and rereading the faith. Choosing a path like this could open up the possibility of opportune choices here while different choices could be made elsewhere.
